THURSDAY, MARCH 27, 1884.

EDWARD HAIGHT PHELPS.

Death of the Chief Engineer of the Michigan Central.

Edward Haight Phelps, chief engineer of the Michigan Central railroad, died at his apartments on Griswold street Detroit Thursday. He recently had an attack of typhoid fever, from which he was thought to have recovered, but his constitution, impaired by much hard work was unequal to the task of recuperation, and his strength slowly failed until dissolution took place. His father, Hon. E. J. Phelps, of Burlington, Vt., and his mother arrived Wednesday night and were at the son's bedside when he died.

Mr. Phelps was born in Middlebury, Vt., June 30, 1847, but passed his boyhood and youth at Burlington. His father is an eminent lawyer, has been president of the American bar association, and is now dean of the law school at Yale, from which college the son graduated in 1870. Leaving college Mr. Phelps went to Europe, where he continued the study of his chosen profession of engineering and finished at the university of Vermont. His first professional work was done as assistant engineer of the New York & Montreal railroad. He was next appointed city engineer of Burlington, where he designed and constructed the water works. He subsequently spent two years in the building of the Panama railroad, and after carrying out various other important works was in 1880 placed in charge of the construction of the Jackson, Lansing & Saginaw extension of the Michigan Central railroad. He was appointed private secretary to Gen. Manager Ledyard in 1882, and a year later was made chief engineer of the Michigan Central system, in which capacity he superintended the building of the Essex Centre cut-off, rebuilt the Kettle creek bridge, constructed the Niagara Falls branch, including the approaches to the cantilever bridge, and with Chief Engineer Fisher, of the New York Central, constituted the board of reference to decide knotty points that arose in the building of the bridge.

Though but 37 years old, it will be seen from this brief sketch that Mr. Phelps had reached a high place in his profession, the result of great ability and unwearying industry. He was extremely popular with the officers and employees of the road, and in social life made many warm friends.
